307. Thematic Session. Higher Education/Shifting Processes

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511B, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Yasemin Soysal, University of Essex

Panelists: Kim Voss, University of California

Michael Sauder, University of Iowa

Francisco O. Ramirez, Stanford University

Yasemin Soysal, University of Essex

Higher Education systems across the globe are being transformed. Recent decades have seen the expansion of the core missions of higher education systems (beyond teaching and research to driving regional and national economic development) along with their increasing embeddedness within a wider framework of competition (facilitated by national and international excellence rankings) and assessments (via national quality assurance schemes). This panel addresses the nature of university changes, the global forces that lead to changes, and the cultural/institutional frames utilized to make sense of these changes.

308. Thematic Session. Population Health and Culture: The Contributions of Sociological Theory and Methods

University

Discussants: Andrew J. Perrin, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

Peter S. Bearman, columbia university

The panel examines multiple ways that the sociological study of culture contributes to improving population health science. Population health seeks to understand how population health outcomes are jointly shaped by the interplay of macro-level factors (e.g. stratification systems and cultural institutions) and individual-level phenomena (e.g. biology, cognition, behavior). This session focuses on one facet that is beginning to receive more attention within population health – culture. Panel members will address the following questions: (a) how do cultural frames, beliefs, and values impact health behaviors, health care, and health promotion; (b) how do individual agency, social interaction, and cultural institutions combine to produce change in health; and (c) what contributions can students of culture address to improve health in the U.S. and across the globe? The panel features three speakers who will present research that examines the cultural underpinnings of health at the population level. The two discussants will reflect on key questions and challenges in conducting research that can augment the contributions of research on culture to understand and improve the health of populations.

309. Thematic Session. Preserving Cultural Heritage: Hegemony, Sustainability, and Global Commodification

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511E, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Alvaro Santana-Acuña, Whitman College

Presider: Alexandra Marie Kowalski

Trading Places: Pathways of Negotiating Space on World Heritage Sites. Robert Parthesius, Leiden University and New York University-Abu Dhabi

World Society and World Heritage. Michael A. Elliott, Towson University; Vaughn Schmutz, University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Commodifying the Past: When Becoming World Heritage Site Does More Harm than Good. Alvaro Santana-Acuña, Whitman College

From Kyoto to Paris to Abu Dhabi, national and local governments strive to preserve their cultural heritage for present and future generations, whether tangible (e.g., cities, buildings, and objects) or intangible (e.g., languages, songs, and rituals). Such efforts are often driven by the desire to acquire the prestigious “World Heritage” label from UNESCO. Instituted in 1972, this UNESCO program only adds to its list heritage of “outstanding universal value.” This list now includes 1031 properties, the majority of which (801) are cultural sites. Most of these are found in Europe, while Africa has the lowest amount of them. This inequality suggests that preservation efforts entail strategies to fix the boundaries of these cultural products. The result is an “imagined heritage,” by which visitors are expected to experience in situ tangible objects or intangible activities that authentically portray peoples’ lives in a given past. This session will analyze the fabrication and preservation of cultural heritage. Who fabricates it and how? How is preservation understood and implemented in different cultural contexts? What role does the UNESCO World Heritage program play in the production of global cultural hegemony? Since World Heritage candidates must meet uniform criteria, can the acquisition of World Heritage status endanger the preservation of a site due to cultural standardization? The session will also address the issue of sustainability by analyzing the clash between rising mass heritage tourism (e.g., Prague's historical center or India's Taj Mahal) and preservationists' call for more inclusive cultural heritage protection.

310. Presidential Session on Current Societal Challenges.

Trump's Challenge to American Democracy?

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 510C, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Michèle Lamont, Harvard University

Presider: Peter Gourevitch, University of California-San Diego

Panelists: Eduardo Bonilla-Silva, Duke University

Jacob Hacker, Yale University

Sidney Tarrow, Cornell University

Joan C. Williams, University of California - Hastings

College

Panelists will address the various ways in which the Trump presidency has created new and distinct challenges for the American Polity, for the political system, as well as for various groups of citizens and non-citizens. Offering different and complementary perspective, they will also draw conclusion and make recommendations for the road ahead.

311. Special Session. Remaking Academic Life Across the Globe: Institutional Ethnographies of the Corporate University

313. Policy and Research Workshop. Engage! How to Win Over the Media, Promote Your Research and Become a Front Page Personality

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 510D, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Carmen Russell, American Sociological Association

Leader: Carmen Russell, American Sociological Association

Panelists: Elizabeth Ghedi-Ehrlich, Scholars Strategy Network

Emily Costello, The Conversation U.S.

Everyday, journalists are looking for expert sources on topics their audiences care about, topics sociologists are natural experts in. They want to talk to you... but are you ready to talk to them? The ASA is looking to bridge that gap and hosting a workshop/panel designed to help members improve their public engagement practices. For that purpose, we are working with The Conversation and Scholars Strategy Network and have invited them to come to Montreal to discuss how they can help sociologists promote their research to the widest possible audience. The Conversation (theconversation.com) is an independent source for informed commentary and analysis, all written by the academic and research community and edited by journalists for the general public as a way of promoting a better understanding of current affairs and complex issues among the public at large. The Scholars Strategy Network (scholarsstrategynetwork.org) seeks to improve public policy and strengthen democracy by organizing scholars working in America's colleges and universities, connecting their research to policymakers, citizens associations, and the media. The workshop panel will provide details on how to:

- Pitch and write commentary, op-eds, essays and analysis for general interest media
- Promote oneself as an expert source on particular topics of interest to media and public
- Engage in an interview whether for print, TV, radio, and live broadcast
- Build a portfolio of "news hits" in the course of creating a public persona as a subject matter expert

340. Presidential Panel. Immigration, Security, Islam in Europe

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 516A, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Michèle Lamont, Harvard University

Chair: Mabel Berezin, Cornell University

Muslims, Islam, and Rethinking Boundaries in Europe. Tariq Modood, University of Bristol

How and Why Does European Neoliberalism Castrate Muslims from Its Body Politic? Fatma Muge Gocek, University of Michigan

Mobility of Individuals and the Question of Security within and without Borders: Muslims in Europe and Migrants' Crises. Riva Kastoryano

Discussant: Louise Cainkar, Marquette University

This session concerns the place of Muslims and Islam in Western Europe. It considers the tensions between their desire to view themselves as socially integrated and valuable contributors to societies, and their stigmatization as 'the enemy within'. It also considers their relationship with other Muslims and their experience of racialization. Their position leads us to rethink social and symbolic boundaries in the post-Brexit European context, against the background of the refugee crisis.

341. Thematic Session. Boundaries and Fields

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511A, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Neil Fligstein, University of California

Presider: Neil Fligstein, University of California

Panelists: Elisabeth S. Clemens, University of Chicago

Neil Fligstein, University of California

Omar A. Lizardo, University of Notre Dame

Douglas McAdam, Stanford University

George Steinmetz, University of Michigan

The concept of "field" has proved useful across a number of sociological research areas. These substantive research programs include the areas of culture, organizations, political sociology, social movements, and race and ethnicity. While the idea of fields has been associated with the work of Pierre Bourdieu, scholars have developed the concept in the context of their engagement with empirical work, often in ways that do not reflect Bourdieu's conceptualization. This panel takes stock of these developments by considering how the different theoretical approaches are used across research areas and what advantages and disadvantages that each has. In particular, we attempt to discuss how to think about problems of boundary formation within and across fields.

342. Thematic Session. Moneyed Families: Wealth Holding and Transmission among the Super Wealthy

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511C, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Jeremy Markham Schulz, University of California, Berkeley

How Permeable is the One Percent? Lisa A. Keister, Duke University

Professions and Plutocrats: Wealth Management and the One Percent. Brooke Harrington, Copenhagen Business School

Socializing the Younger Generation in Multigenerational Business Families - Strategies and Trajectories. Jeremy Markham Schulz, University of California, Berkeley

Being "Good People": The Moral Imperatives of Legitimate Privilege. Rachel Sherman, New School for Social Research

Discussant: Shamus Rahman Khan, Columbia University

Although it is widely acknowledged that economically elite families play an important role in the stratification system, they have not yet garnered sufficient attention from social scientists. In this session, prominent scholars will bring fresh insights to a range of topics connected to wealth-holding and wealth transmission among the global ultra-wealthy, a cutting-edge research area within sociology. The papers will touch on stratification, economic sociology, the sociology of culture, and sociology of the family. They will have a broad appeal to both scholars and students. Brooke Harrington, Copenhagen Business School, highlights the secretive world of global wealth management experts and the ways in which they work closely with ultra-wealthy families to preserve wealth and shield it from government authorities. Jeremy Schulz, UC Berkeley, highlights the complex role of liquid and illiquid wealth within multigenerational business families in provoking conflict and building solidarity. He explores the symbolic meanings of both forms of wealth and how they mediate relations between older and younger generations. Lisa Keister will discuss how individuals and families accumulate wealth and join the top ranks of wealth holders. Rachel Sherman, New School for Social Research, looks at how wealthy and privileged New York parents cast themselves as morally worthy of their social advantages and thus as legitimately entitled. Legitimate entitlement depends on hard work, reasonable consumption, giving back, and raising children with similarly "good values."

343. Thematic Session. Multicultural, Intercultural, Transcultural: Which Models and Which Practices for the Inclusion of Differences in the Americas?

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511B, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Jean-Francois Cote, Université du Québec à Montréal

Presider: André Tremblay, University of Ottawa

The Elusive Search for the Inclusion of Difference: Critical Reflections on Power, Contemporary Citizenship, and Indigenous Peoples-Settler Relations in Canada. Daniel Salée, Concordia University

Indigenous Conquest, Genocide, Assimilation, Resistance to Settler Colonialism: Competing Models for First Nations Survivance and Revitalization in the Americas. James V. Fenelon, California State University, San Bernardino

Contextualizing Quebec's Interculturalism in Canada's Multiculturalism: A Transcultural Standpoint. Afef Benessaïeh, TÉLUQ

Discussant: Ben Carrington, University of Texas-Austin

Throughout the 20th century, various models of social inclusion have been proposed in order to reconsider the monolithic vision of national cultures among the various societies in the Americas, ranging from multicultural, or intercultural, to transcultural – either in the United States, Canada, Québec, Mexico, Brazil, Peru, or elsewhere. Based either on the recognition of the presence of a plurality of the cultural communities in a society (multicultural), of the relations among those cultural communities (intercultural), or again of the transformations occurring in the meeting of those cultural communities (transcultural), those models have fueled different kinds of sociological analysis, as well as public policies in various contexts, and have been embodied in a wide variety of social and cultural expressions. Is one of these models, or which one of these models, can pretend to a more adequate vision of the inclusion of the cultural differences (and particularly, for example, of the inclusion of First Nations) within the various societies throughout the Americas? If so, what are the practices associated with these models, in terms of their social, aesthetic and ethical dimensions? How do the practices intersect with the (multi/inter/trans)cultural representations in those contexts? How are the specific cultural practices defined in such occasions? How are they performed? Do they ask for specific forms of dramatization, and to what extent do they reframe the grand narrative of national cultures? How far do they still challenge the monolithic vision promoted by the Western/European legacy of the modern colonization of the Americas, relayed by the formation of the nation-states throughout the Americas? And is there any possibility of transnational or hemispheric identification produced accordingly.

344. Thematic Session. What You See is What You Get?
New Thinking on Race and the Visual

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511E, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Ann J. Morning, New York University

Presider: Ann J. Morning, New York University

The Biotechnical Gaze: Me and 23andMe. Simone Browne, University of Texas at Austin

Racializing 'Invisible' Minorities in Japan: A Step Beyond the Trans-Atlantic Paradigm. Yasuko Takezawa, Kyoto University

What You See Is What You Get? Influences of Ancestry and Phenotype on Racial Perception and Categorization.

Destiny Peery, Northwestern University

Race has long been believed in the West to be a straightforward matter of perceiving obvious differences in superficial physical traits. As Western societies have become more demographically heterogeneous, however, the idea that one can simply “see” race has increasingly come under fire. Myriad groups including but not limited to multiracial people, Latinos, South Asians and Middle Easterners pose challenges to racial classification as usual in official checkboxes. And while some contend that DNA-based definitions offer a solution for assigning individuals to races, there is no definitive genetic taxonomy on the horizon. If anything, both biologists and social scientists have demolished the myth that races are genetically discrete, naturally-rooted and objectively-delineated groupings of human beings. Yet the widespread belief that we passively “see” racial difference endures, making it a key element of the cultural toolkit of racially stratified societies.

345. Thematic Session. Youth Jobs and the Future: Problems and Prospects

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511D, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Lynn Sharon Chancer, Hunter College

Presider: Lynn Sharon Chancer, Hunter College

Panelists: Maria Kefalas, St. Joseph's University

Lynn Sharon Chancer, Hunter College

Arne L. Kalleberg, University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill

Michael Hout, New York University

Discussant: Christine Trost, University of California-Berkeley

A recently published report The Plummeting Labor Market Fortunes of Teens and Young Adults (2014) found employment prospects for teens and young adults had grown precipitously worse between 2000 and 2011. During the ‘Great Recession’ of 2007, youth unemployment in America soared to a post-War record of 19%. While this social problem is well-known and focused upon across Europe, it is very severe – if relatively overlooked – in the United States where, currently, 10 million youth are without work and millions more are under-employed. Moreover, surprisingly little has been written about youth unemployment specifically, and the sense of anxiety it creates within what Arne Kalleberg calls a now ‘precarious economy.’ In the US, labor market policies generally have been discussed, but mostly in terms of simple loss of earnings whereas early life unemployment creates a harmful multiplier effect, engendering a wide range of negative adult life outcomes and attendant social problems. Most worrisome, perhaps, is the significant increase in American youth who feel insecure and ‘disconnected’ from work and education, and who feel that their life chances and opportunities are depressingly uncertain or declining. Youth joblessness is a major public issue affecting American society and culture. Ironically, social scientific responses to youth joblessness have been analogously ‘disconnected’. Within sociology, not enough discussion has taken place between scholars interested in political economy, culture, work, labor and family about this issue: also the problem of youth joblessness has not been tackled with the focused aim of influencing policy-makers, politicians, and legislators. This panel tries to fill in this gap with papers that take a wide range of perspectives on youth, jobs and precarity. Each of the papers also make policy recommendations – some involving economic and political changes, and others changes in cultural attitudes – so as to both further investigate this issue and recognize its significance going forward

346. Presidential Session on Current Societal Challenges.

The Trump/Brexit Moment: Causes and Consequences

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 518B, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Mike Savage, LSE

Presider: Mike Savage, LSE

The Lost Unifying Energy of the State: Responding to Three Constituents: EU states, Financial Markets and the People. Patrick Le Galès, Sciences Po CNRS

The Revolt of the Rust Belt: Place, Politics, and Sociology in the Twenty-First Century. Michael McQuarrie, London School of Economics

The Cultural Resonance of Symbolic Boundaries Discourse and Trump’s Triumph: The Case of the White Working Class. Bo Yun Park, Harvard University; Elena Ayala-Hurtado, Harvard University; Michèle Lamont, Harvard University

American Hybrid: Donald Trump’s Strange Marriage of Populism and Plutocracy. Paul Pierson, University of California-Berkeley

This session reflects on challenges posed by the U.S. election and related political developments in Europe, such as the ‘Brexit’ referendum in the UK. Papers discuss how we can understand the election of Donald Trump as President of the United States, and what sense social scientists in particular can make of the political events that are now shaping political and social life in the US, the UK, and elsewhere. They examine the dimensions of sociology to which the election result calls attention – for example, populism, nationalism, inequality, anti-elite politics, migration, finance, and expertise – as well as considering the broader global patterns in which Donald Trump’s election appears to fit. This session brings together some of the authors contributing to a special issue of The British Journal of Sociology to be published in Fall 2017, to be edited by Nigel Dodd, Michele Lamont, and Mike Savage.

347. Special Session. Generations of Suicide:

Understanding Cohort Differences in Suicide Risk

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512A, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Steven Stack, Wayne State University

Presider: Frank Trovato, The University of Alberta

Durkheim and His Discontents: A Social Psychological, Emotional, and Cultural Re-Appraisal of Suicide. Anna S. Mueller, The University of Chicago; Seth Abrutyn, University of British Columbia

How Being “The Other” Matters: Examining the Influence of Social Context on the Individual Risk of Suicide Using a U.S. Big Data Solution. Bernice A. Pescosolido, Indiana University

Generations of Suicide: Understanding the Increased Risk for Suicide among U.S. Postwar Birth Cohorts. Julie A. Phillips, Rutgers University

The Strain Theory of Suicide. Jie Zhang, SUNY College at Buffalo

Discussant: Matt Wray, Temple University

The session deals with current developments in the sociological analysis of suicide, on the occasion of the 120th anniversary of the publication of Durkheim’s classic work, Suicide. Each participant will deal with how their perspective is both similar and different from that of a classic Durkheimian model of suicide and discuss the latest developments in their ongoing stream of research on suicide.

348. Special Session. Intra- and Inter-Religious Divisions (cosponsored with Association for the Sociology of Religion)

InterContinental Montreal, A. Fraser, 10:30am-12:10pm
Session Organizer: Michael O. Emerson, North Park University

Presider: Michael O. Emerson, North Park University

Religion, Gender and the Sociology of Islam: Sunni and Shi’a Perspectives on Gender Traditionalism. Gabriel A Acevedo, University of Texas at San Antonio

Civil Religion and the Crisis in American National Identity. Rhys H. Williams, Loyola University Chicago

The Freedom to Choose: Religious Homes, Religious Divorces, and Who’s Homeless. Nancy Ammerman, Boston University

Discussant: Korie L. Edwards, Ohio State University

Papers in this session situate religion under a framework of intersectionality. Invited session participants will discuss how religion intersects with gender, national identity, and family. Through the framework of intersectionality, this session will contribute to our understandings about intra- and inter-religious divisions.

349. Author Meets Critics Session. Love, Money and HIV: Becoming a Modern African Woman in the Age of AIDS (University of California Press, 2014) by Sanyu A. Mojola

Discussant: Christel Kesler, Colby College

351. Policy and Research Workshop. Grant-Seeking from Private Foundations: What Investigators Should Know Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512B, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: James A. Wilson, Russell Sage Foundation

Leader: James A. Wilson, Russell Sage Foundation

Panelists: Leana Chatrath, Russell Sage Foundation

Rhoda Freelon, Spencer Foundation

Vivian S. Louie, William T. Grant Foundation

Seeking external funding for social science research is an increasingly competitive process and preparing a successful letter of inquiry and grant application can be a challenging and time-consuming exercise. In addition to the many government sources of research funding, private foundations can also be an important source of financial support. It is important however, to recognize that foundations differ from government sources in their funding priorities – foundations generally tend to have more constrained resources and target their funding for more specific purposes. In this panel session, program staff from three of the nation’s most prominent funders of social, educational, economic and policy research will provide an overview of foundation programs and priorities, new initiatives, and the basics of grant-seeking from private foundations. With extensive experience in evaluating proposals as part of the grant-making process, panelists will also discuss, from the perspective of a funding organization, what investigators should consider when writing a grant application. This panel is designed to be especially useful for early career scholars but is also informative for more experienced investigators.

352. Teaching Workshop. The Benefits of Integrating Community Service as a Vehicle for Enhancing Courses to Promote Social Justice and Humanistic Values

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512C, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Michelle Marie Proctor, Madonna University

The focus of this interactive workshop will be to engage participants through discussion and activities exploring the latent and manifest benefits and logistical challenges of collaborative community service-learning projects. The goals of this workshop will be to assist participants in gaining insight into the value of community service-learning. In addition it will provide insight into pedagogical skills that can be used to promote and implement opportunities for students to become aware of power inequalities existing within society generally, and more specifically how they can develop and promote a sense of social justice of non-human animals.

Discussant: Prerna Singh, Brown University

Across the globe, societies are pulled apart by conflicts driven by linguistic, religious and ethno-racial differences, poverty and inequality, nativity, and more. Yet, hope persists against all odds, fed by normative commitments for belonging, solidarity, and social justice. This plenary features social scientists who are asked to reflect on actual and potential political and societal tools for achieving a better future and more successful societies. They will discuss some of the main challenges we face, and ways to make symbolic and social boundaries more permeable for greater social inclusion. This session is supported by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

ASA staff will present data on the representation of various groups in the ASA leadership. The President will discuss what the ASA has done to address concerns about inclusion in our professional association and, together with three council members, will engage in an exchange with the audience concerning what we can do better. We will address not only diversity in our organization, but larger issues about participation, cultural citizenship, and marginalization in departmental life and higher education more generally. Please join us for constructive conversation about concrete steps ahead.

381. Thematic Session. Moving On Up: Symbolic Boundary Creation and Upward Mobility Amongst Middle and Professional Classes in the Global South

Over the last three decades, global inequality has become increasingly characterized by within-country rather than between-country income inequality (Firebaugh 2003). And while there is contestation over the role globalization plays in this process (Giddens 1999), the diffusion of neoliberalism has undoubtedly shaped the way in which mobility is experienced and symbolic boundaries are traced across the world. This panel seeks to critically examine the contemporary reconfiguration of this stratification amongst upper-middle, middle and professional classes in global south sites where these processes are particularly rampant. We invite papers that decode the ways in which established social structures and traditional hierarchies in these countries are being renegotiated through social, cultural and economic processes. Unlike established postindustrial societies, we expect sites in the global south to allow us a window into understanding meaning-making processes as a response to global cultural references and exchanges. We not only seek to gain a better understanding of the composition of these new kinds of elite mobility but also of the ways in which the boundaries that demarcate "elite", "professionals" and "middle class" are defined anew in a globalizing world. What are the new markers of class in these sites? How do these frame pre-existing norms and cultural repertoires? What can that tell us about the complex relationship between globalization and stratification? We expect these comparisons to help inform new ways of understanding both similarities and difference between national cases; as well as to introduce new ways of thinking through concepts and methodologies inherited from the West.

Much social science research is motivated by a desire to solve social problems through informed policymaking and practice. This session explores the role of culture in structuring the reception and use of social science research in the policymaking process and implementation of policies and programs. What can we learn about the role of social science research in policymaking from applying the conceptual tools of cultural sociology? How do the cultural logics of policymakers and policymaking institutions influence how they use, misuse, or ignore evidence from social scientists? When and how do ideas and knowledge travel from academia to public discourse and policy debates? Panelists from both inside and outside academia will address these questions across policy domains and in comparative perspective.

383. Thematic Session. Post-Bourdieuian Theoretical Agendas

Talent and Creativity at Work: The New Social Physics of Inequality. Pierre-Michel Menger, Collège de France

Discussant: Mustafa Emirbayer, University of Wisconsin at Madison

This session explores the contemporary fruitfulness of Pierre Bourdieu's work for setting new theoretical agendas. It features contemporary research breaking new theoretical ground by going back directly to the work of Bourdieu and developing original readings of it, or building on some of its previously overlooked aspects. The session pays special attention to issues of culture and social boundaries, two themes that stand prominently on the Annual Meeting's agenda. The work of panelists will illustrate how Bourdieu-inspired insights into these themes can be creatively recombined to think anew about stratification, reproduction, and inequality in contemporary societies. Most significantly, these new theoretical developments share an interest in understanding these phenomena at a finer-grained level than was typically done in prior waves of Bourdieusian research. Presentations will reflect in particular on how Bourdieu's sociology of culture may serve as a foundation for a social aesthetics and a general cultural sociology (Martin and Merriman); on the mutual constitution of cultural and social structures and its relevance for thinking about status and valuation (Accominotti); on the influence of the Bourdieusian legacy for theorizing processes of exploitation (Mears); and on the new social physics of inequality (Menger).

384. Thematic Session. Secularism and Religion in the Public Sphere: Unintended Cultural Consequences

Strangers in a Strange Election. Michael Hout, New York University; Arlie Russell Hochschild, Univ. of California-Berkeley

Discussant: Gene Burns, Michigan State University

This panel will offer diverse perspectives on the cross-cutting ways in which religious ethics and secular pressures are re-orienting American society. The first paper, by John Torpey, will critique recent theorizing on the so-called axial age by demonstrating how its one-sided, religious-ideas framework for the emergence of modernity does not satisfactorily account for the persistence of cultural conflicts and societal problems. In the second presentation, Michele Dillon will discuss the secular reception of Pope Francis's critique of climate change, drawing attention to its politicization in the U.S. by those on the left (as well as the right), and how this politicization contributes to distorting public communication. This will be followed by a conversation between Michael Hout and Arlie Hochschild on the growing religious and cultural divide in the U.S. Hout will draw on national survey data, and Hochschild on her qualitative research in Louisiana, to explore current tensions at the intersection of religion, secularism, and political culture. The panel discussant, Gene Burns, will draw on his expertise in religion and political sociology to offer integrating remarks and reflections on the issues at stake.

385. Special Session. Religion's Role in International Conflicts and Violence (cosponsored with Association for the Sociology of Religion)

Genetic data and methods have a growing presence in sociology as well as other social scientific disciplines. In recent years, the new research fields of geneoconomics, genopolitics, and genosociology have emerged. What aspects of contemporary American scientific, political, or popular culture have favored the rise of such fields? And what are their likely consequences? This panel will combine presentations from leading sociologists who are currently working to integrate genetic research into social science and those from sociologists who are studying the ramifications of their efforts.

Tristan Bridges, University of California, Santa Barbara

A completed but unpublished dissertation differs greatly from a book based on dissertation research. Dissertations use a clear methodology to research and explain a topic to a scholarly community so that advisers will understand and validate the work. By contrast, a published book must tell the story of research differently, with fresh insight, clarity, and a new audience in mind. This workshop focuses on how to make the writing transition from dissertation to book. It outlines: (1) differences between the dissertation and the book manuscript; (2) the intermediate stages in transforming dissertation research into a book manuscript; (3) common barriers to this transformation and strategies to overcome them; and (4) elements of a book prospectus. The workshop will provide informational materials and will include a brief audience Q&A and a hands-on workshop in which participants will work on one of three stages in the book development process: (1) deciding whether to write a book/writing the proposal; (2) shopping the proposal/negotiating the contract; or (3) writing the full manuscript/preparing for marketing.

The sociological study of culture has long been advanced through qualitative methods that focus on problems of interpretation, hermeneutics, subjectivity, “thick description,” and the study of implicit knowledge. Over the last 25 years quantitative sociologists have also increasingly been turning their attention to the study of culture. Initially this work embraced a production of culture approach which de-emphasized cultural content in favor of studies of cultural organizations and markets, but more recently we have also seen many new projects that seek to use formal methods to pursue more interpretative analyses of culture. This tendency has accelerated with the rise of social network modeling and more recently with an explosion of techniques for Big Data analysis, as many more opportunities are opening up to study culture in its relational aspects (both social and semiotic), to mine cultural content that is stored in digital formats, and to move from content analysis to the large-scale study of (what many analysts consider to be) unmediated text data. In this workshop we will review some of the main styles of formal studies of culture with the goal of providing a general overview of these methodologies, showing what they can and cannot do, and pointing workshop attendees to other important citations, training resources, and new research tools. Topics include forms of cultural analysis that employ network analysis methods, correspondence analysis, computational linguistics, social media data as well as other forms of Big Data.

This session considers the forms that poverty takes, the extent to which the poor are stigmatized across societies, and the circumstances that make the non-poor more likely to support social inclusion. Participants consider various cultural, institutional and social processes as well as policies that are put in place to improve social inclusion. This ranges from interventions in rural India that aim to transform social networks outside traditional caste and kinship networks, to studies that investigate how cities respond to housing crisis across continents and how non-profit aims to mobilize the poor for greater community involvement.

418. Thematic Session. Changing the Cultural Narrative

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511A, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Marc W. Steinberg, Smith College

Presider: Marc W. Steinberg, Smith College

Panelists: Wendy Leo Moore, Texas A&M University

Zulema Valdez, University of California, Merced

Joyce M. Bell, University of Minnesota

Discussant: Matthew W. Hughey, University of Connecticut

Recent surveys suggest a waning belief in the Horatio Alger story and the metanarrative of the American Dream, particularly among younger generations. If this is the case there are important questions about how alternative narratives—particularly those which emphasize the collective rather than the individual and equity rather than hierarchy—might supersede this metanarrative. This session focuses on the possibilities for the rise and dissemination of alternative narratives in arenas such as politics and popular culture. How do such narratives gain legitimacy and achieve diffusion? In what ways does narrative struggle channel and limit the rise of alternatives?

419. Thematic Session. New Perspectives on Culture In, Around, and Through Social Networks

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511C, 4:30-6:10pm

In recent years, a growing amount of scholarship has benefitted from interrogation of synthetic approaches to studying culture and social networks in order to understand micro-, meso-, and macro-level social processes. This session will explore theoretical and methodological challenges as well as rewards of doing so. Leading scholars in this area will present their recent work on this topic, which will be followed by a panel discussion of how their perspectives overlap as well as differ.

420. Thematic Session. Race, Culture, and Exclusion for People on the Move

Global migration has played a significant role in transforming the locales to which individuals immigrate and the communities from which these migrants come. In recent years, Global North countries have struggled to incorporate larger influxes of (Global South) migrants amid a global recession and fiscal budget constraints as well as increasing socio-political conflict and concerns about climate change that have put people on the move. In receiving countries, a big concern is how these migrants, who hail from Africa, Asia, the Middle East, and Latin America and have different cultures, religions, and languages, will “fit” into their new societies. These migrants also bring significant ethno-racial heterogeneity and challenge cultural and national understandings of belonging and citizenship. Likewise, immigrant-sending countries struggle with how to fill the social, economic, and political absence left by these migrants. Yet, through transnational ties maintained while residing in host countries, migrants transmit global cultural and racial conceptions to family, friends, and institutions at home. This transnational movement has yielded challenges in what it means to belong to and be included in one or multiple nation-states, as well as a (re) construction of social and symbolic group boundaries. Therefore, this panel of race, culture, and migration scholars will discuss how race and ethnicity factor into cultural interpretations of inclusion/exclusion at the micro or macro level for migrants of diverse ethno-racial backgrounds in Brazil, Mexico, Spain, and the United States.

421. Special Session. Learning Race and Ethnicity: Socialization in the Family

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 516D, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Chinyere Osuji, Rutgers University

Presider: Chinyere Osuji, Rutgers University

Panelists: Jenifer L. Bratter, Rice University

Angela D. James

Velma McBride Murry, Vanderbilt University

The family is one of the most important institutions of socialization, including for membership into racial and ethnic groups and categories. With Asians, Blacks, Latinos, and multiracial individuals comprising the majority of children in the U.S., it becomes more imperative to understand the role of race and ethnicity in families. It will highlight emerging research on: multiracial identification; parental ethno-racial identification of children; the role of race in defining family; and the social psychological factors of ethno-racial socialization. The work and perspectives shared in this session will stimulate thinking on how to best conceptualize the roles and patterns of race and ethnicity in one of the most key institutions of socialization, the family. Keywords: family, race, ethnicity, multiracial, African American, youth, children

426. Professional Development Workshop. Creating and Using Accountability Groups

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512A, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Craig Upright, Winona State University

Professional academics work in a unique institutional environment juggling teaching, researching, writing, and administration all with a typically flexible schedule. However, some of the most important career impacting projects -- such as dissertation writing, article publishing, and manuscript proposals -- have no deadlines and often take a back seat to more pressing and time-contingent matters. This workshop will introduce the concept of "accountability groups," informal collections of scholars who keep each other "accountable" daily on the progress of certain projects. Craig Upright will explain how the accountability group he created helped him stay focused by employing a relatively simple program. At the end of the workshop participants will have an opportunity to form their own accountability groups with each other.
