154. Thematic Session. (New) Stigmatization and Discrimination

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511F, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Michèle Lamont, Harvard University

Presider: Michèle Lamont, Harvard University

Visible Stigmatization and Contested Responses: Black Brazilians reactions to Stigma and Discrimination in Rio de Janeiro. Graziella Moraes D. Silva, Graduate Institute in Geneva - IHEID

The Persistence of the Color Line: African Americans' Experiences with Racism and Discrimination. Jessica S. Welburn, University of Iowa

National Belonging in a Jewish Democracy: The Case of Arab Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Josh Guetzkow, Hebrew University

Discussant: Bernice A. Pescosolido, Indiana University

Panelists will discuss the greater salience of stigmatization as compared to discrimination across variously marked groups. They will also highlight how national contexts and cultural repertoires influence types of responses individual offer when confronting racism. They will also compare the salience of collective and individual responses in the context of neoliberalism. The panel will show how history, social and symbolic boundaries and groupness enable and constrain the experience of everyday racism.

155. Thematic Session. Encountering the Law

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511A, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Brian Gran, Case Western Reserve University

Presider: Brian Gran, Case Western Reserve University

Christopher Nigel Roberts, University of Minnesota

Navigating U.S. Law along the United States-Mexico

Borderlands. Mary Romero, Arizona State University

Law's Struggle with Religion: Equality and Inclusion. Bryan Turner, City University of New York-Graduate Center

Now more than ever, people across the world are encountering law in manifold areas of social life. As human rights are implemented, institutions and cultures of rights are created and sometimes suppressed. Newcomers encounter different ideas, languages, beliefs, and practices, often through legal systems, whether local, national, or international. Actors running these legal systems, which are often corrupt, may take a dim view of strangers' legal concerns. Individuals who are vulnerable may turn to "law" for protection, even while many people are discovering that law increasingly serves as a panopticon across multiple hierarchies and in many parts of their societies. Sociologists participating in this panel will present cutting-edge ideas and research on multiple encounters people experience with law in all areas of contemporary social life. While this panel will remind us that law is everywhere, panelists will offer insights into new questions for sociological scholarship on law.

156. Thematic Session. How Technology is Changing Social Relationships

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511C, 8:30-10:10am

The impact of contemporary technologies on interpersonal relationships has riveted public attention. Anxieties about concerning smartphone-obsessed parents who neglect their children, teenagers socializing in virtual spaces, and the ever-growing importance of social media in all spheres of life, from online romance to online activism. What do we know empirically about new technology and social interactions so far, and what else lies ahead?

157. Special Session. Gen(der) X: New Cultural Revolutions in the Global South And The Restructuring of Women's Work

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511B, 8:30-10:10am

Gendered Politics Among Informal Workers In India. Rina Agarwala, Johns Hopkins University

Thinking Global Restructuring With Gender: What Are The Stakes? Leslie Salzinger, University of California at Berkeley

Discussant: Cynthia Fuchs Epstein, Graduate Center, CUNY

This panel seeks to unpack the processes of economic and cultural restructuring by highlighting research on gender and work in the global south. Showcasing evidence from India, Mexico and the Middle East, panelists use emerging economies as unique petri dishes to witness the impact of global production networks on micro inequalities. Together, we will ask: When we view the market through this lens of gendered personhood, how do we make sense of these cultural orders and shifts? And in what ways do these exogenous scripts mold internal social movements in these societies? The last half-century has witnessed a range of international responses to the dissemination of neoliberal markets, norms and values. One such significant reaction has been the worldwide systemic inclusion of women in new kinds of workforces. And more recent research reveals these renegotiations are palpable even in higher ends of the labor spectrum. For example, in Arab “global” work environments, although women and men both suffer penalties for being “local”, men suffer a higher relative penalty in global contexts than their female peers. Similarly, research from India’s elite professional firms show that women uniquely poised to restructure cultural scripts because domestic firms over conform to idealized neoliberal values of merit and equality. By invoking these perspectives, this panel urges its’ audience to look not just as how markets become cultural; but also how in these sites of emergence, markets produce new cultures of an ideal worker capable of renegotiating existing hierarchies of gender and class.

158. Author Meets Critics Session. Citizen-Protectors: The Everyday Politics of Guns in an Age of Decline (Oxford University Press, 2015) by Jennifer Carlson

159. Policy and Research Workshop. The Panel Study of Income Dynamics

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512D, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Paula W. Fomby, University of Michigan

Leader: Paula W. Fomby, University of Michigan

This interactive workshop is geared toward current and prospective users of the Panel Study of Income Dynamics (PSID, psid.org), the world’s longest running longitudinal household panel survey. It provides an overview of the general structure and content of PSID and its supplemental surveys (including the Child Development Supplement, the Transition into Adulthood Supplement, and the Disability and Time Use Supplement) as well as an update on recent and current data collection efforts (the Rosters & Transfers Files, the Childhood Retrospective Circumstances Study, the Web/Mail Supplement, and the 2014 Child Development Supplement). The second half of the workshop includes a detailed walk-through of the PSID website, documentation, and data center as well as a question and answer session related to participant specific inquiries. The PSID has collected data on a wide range of sociologically relevant topics from a nationally representative sample of US families and their descendants since 1968. Content domains include employment, occupations, income, wealth, education, expenditures, health, aging, marriage, childbearing, child development, youth transitions, philanthropy, intergenerational relations, and numerous other topics.

160. Teaching Workshop. The Politics of Collaboration: Issues of Power and Pedagogy in Faculty-Student

Research Partnerships

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512B, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Gary Alan Fine, Northwestern University

Leader: Gary Alan Fine, Northwestern University

Co-Leader: Peter S. Bearman, Columbia University

Panelists: Ann Mische, University of Notre Dame

Dawn T. Robinson, University of Georgia

Iddo Tavory, NYU

How to maintain a productive research collaboration between faculty and graduate students is a salient challenge, but is one with great benefits. As scholars who have engaged in important collaborations as students and as faculty, we recognize issues of power and the importance of clarity in setting the terms of any joint scholarly engagement both prior to the project and throughout data collection, writing, and the publication process. When operating with trust and transparency, collaboration can be important for pedagogy and mentorship, but at times dissatisfactions and even feelings of betrayal or deception are possible. With many sociological publications developing from a “research team,” explicit attention to collaboration across status lines is essential.

Beyond standard arguments concerning cultural capital, credentialism and expertise, the sociological literature on how culture contributes to inequality in higher education and knowledge production has been exploding over the last thirty years. Participants in this session will tackle this question by considering the boundary between academic knowledge and the policy making world as it shapes educational inequality, canonization of disciplinary knowledge, comparative higher education, and the fate of public universities.

In most massified educational systems, the rankings and quantified indicators have become progressively more frequent and contribute to the hierarchization of pupils and schools. Quantitative evaluations are used to measure "educational performances," not only for international comparisons, but also to assess the efficiency and the impact of programs, and management and treatment of educational problems. The way they are read and used by the actors may contribute to the stagnancy of the social, racial and gender inequalities, but with the impression of a transparency and an equal school system. This thematic session investigates evaluation practices in different countries and their presumed objectivity, as well as the alternative views of such practices by educational actors, parents, and pupils. From a critical perspective, this session will highlight the effects of educational evaluation practices on social, gender, and racial inequalities in schools. The differences in the educational systems' structure, their organization and their contribution to these inequalities will be discussed in the light of the different levels, from primary to higher education, in order to emphasize the variations in the amplitude of these reproduction. This session includes papers from the USA, Belgium, Switzerland, and France and will contribute to the international comparison on these questions.

194. Thematic Session. Global Work, Culture and Inequality

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511E, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Allison Pugh, University of Virginia

Presider: Jennifer M. Silva, Bucknell University

Cultural Conceptions of Work: Women's Narratives in Spain, Japan, and the United States. Mary C. Brinton, Harvard University

One Divides into Two: Team Moves in Finance. Olivier Godechot, Sciences Po

Cultural Workscapes: The Lives of Business Professionals in France, Norway, and the United States. Jeremy Markham Schulz, University of California, Berkeley

The Moral Measure of Overwork. Allison Pugh, University of Virginia; Sarah Elizabeth Mosseri, University of Virginia

Multiple scholars have documented the power of work as a moral measure in the United States. Despite increased work precariousness, and some reported ambivalence about work by cohort or generation, there is evidence that many invest increasing symbolic importance in work – in having a full-time job, being busy, working long hours, and the like – as proof of one's adulthood, honor, or character. How does this compare globally or, in the US, across populations? Panelists will consider the culture of work in various contexts and comparatively, including in finance/tech sectors, in the US, Europe and elsewhere, and by gender and class.

195. Thematic Session. International Perspectives on the Measurement of Race and Ethnicity

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511F, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Martin Bulmer, University of Surrey, UK

Presider: Martin Bulmer, University of Surrey, UK

Ethnic and Linguistic Categories in Québec: Counting to Survive. Victor Piché, McGill University, Université de Montréal

The Failure of the Importation of Ethno-racial Statistics in Europe: Debates and Controversies. Patrick Simon, Institut National des Études Démographiques

Demographic Change in Interracial Unions and How We Conceptualise and Measure Race and Mixture. Miri Song, University of Kent

Multiple Race Measures across Latin America and Implications for Estimating Ethnoracial Composition and Measuring Inequality. Edward E. Telles, University of California-Santa Barbara

Methodological Pitfalls of Measuring Race, or Some of its Dimensions. Wendy D. Roth, University of British Columbia

Discussant: Danielle Juteau, Université de Montréal

Issues of capturing statistically ethnic diversity in the contemporary world remain a challenge across cultures, embodying different conceptions of the meaning of ethnic difference and variation. This session will focus on issues such as the use of the term "race" and color, reliance on questions on national origin, the significance of language, use of religion as a marker, and the problems posed by capturing ethnic mixture. There will be a particular emphasis on French Canada, Europe and Latin America.

196. Special Session. Culture and Embodied Cognition: Readjusting Boundaries between Mind, Brain, and Body

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511A, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Karen A. Cerulo, Rutgers University

Presider: Karen A. Cerulo, Rutgers University

What is the Right Level of Psychological Realism for Cultural Sociology? Stephen Vaisey, Duke University

When Objects Meet Bodies: What Materiality Teaches Us about Embodied Cognition. Terence Emmett McDonnell, University of Notre Dame

Organized Embodiment. Janet Vertesi, Princeton University

Racializing Smell: Olfaction and Embodied Cognition. Karen A. Cerulo, Rutgers University

How do we think ... make meaning ... process and comprehend the people and things we encounter in our daily existence? Traditionally, scholars studying these matters offer different answers to these complex questions. Some—including neurologists, cognitive psychologists, evolutionary biologists and computer scientists—attend almost exclusively to neural operations. They address what we might call the "inside" aspects of thought, as they tie the structure and function of the brain to processes such as attention, perception, classification and memory. Others—including cognitive sociologists, cultural anthropologists and social psychologists—attend to what we might call the "outside" dimensions of thought. Here the study of mind takes priority over the brain as scholars explore the sociocultural conventions and norms that inform what we attend to or ignore, how we classify people, places, objects or events, and what we remember or forget during our social encounters and experiences. In recent years, a third group of scholars have suggested a more expansive approach to cognition. Theories of "embodied cognition" help us bridge brain and mind and connect the inside and outside elements of thought. The body is central in building that bridge. Embodied cognition theories suggest that how we think, make meaning, process and comprehend the world involves the sentient—what our bodies feel, what they see, hear, smell, taste and touch. Thus the brain alone cannot explain how we think, and thought is not simply the product of cultural patterns and rules. For these theorists, our bodily experiences and the contexts in which those experiences are situated prove equally important to a thorough understanding of cognition. In this session, participants will present sociological research that is informed by the embodied cognition movement. Through both theoretically and empirically based presentations, panelists will offer support for the perspective as a lens on culture and cognition. Moreover, they will address what the embodied cognition movement holds for the future of culture and cognition and the steps the field must take to fully realize such benefits

197. Special Session. Religion's Role in Peace, Justice, and Missions Movements (cosponsored with Association for the Sociology of Religion)

InterContinental Montreal, A. Fraser, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Michael O. Emerson, North Park University

Presider: William A. Mirola, Marian University

Faith-Based Social Movements and Racial Justice Under the Trump Regime. Richard L. Wood, University of New Mexico

Fostering Diversity in Multiracial Congregations in the United States. Rebecca Y. Kim, Pepperdine University

Creation Care: The Emergence of the Religious Environmental Movement. Stephen Ellingson, Hamilton College

Discussant: Laurel Kearns, Drew University

Papers in this session address religion's roles in peace, justice, and mission movements, both within the United States and from a global comparison perspective. Participants in this session will present research related to religion's roles in different areas such as politics, environmental protection, and racial relations.

198. Special Session. The "Culture" of Immigration: Understanding Migration Through (Non-Essentialist) Cultural Analysis

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511D, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: John O'Brien, NYU Abu Dhabi

Presider: John O'Brien, NYU Abu Dhabi

How the Meanings of Ethnicity Change by Context, Life Course Phase and Legal Status. Robert Courtney Smith, City University of New York-Baruch College, Graduate Center

Racial Remittances: How Ideologies of Race Travel with Migrants. Sylvia Zamora, Loyola Marymount University

Gendered Institutions and Immigrant Categorizing. Sara R. Curran, University of Washington

Dreams Fulfilled or Dreams Dashed: West African Diversity Visa Lottery Winners in the United States. Onoso Ikphemi Imoagene, University of Pennsylvania

Despite the "cultural" nature of many of the issues central to migration scholarship, the application of tools and concepts from the sociology of culture to investigate questions of immigration has been, overall, halting and uneven (Levitt 2005, Menjivar 2010). This session will explore the possibilities of a more cultural approach to the study of migration by bringing together sociologists who are employing tools of cultural analysis to study migration processes and subjectivities. The session will both highlight effective strategies for using culture to investigate pressing and timely questions about migration, and identify common threads that might form the basis of a shared cultural sociology of immigration. The questions that such a sociology would seek to answer, both in this session and beyond, might include: How do migrants classify and assign meaning to members of receiving country populations, and vice versa? How is cultural life and practice reorganized at the level of everyday life in the process of settlement? How are newly emergent forms of identity and self-classification among migrant populations contested and negotiated in the intra-group setting? How do migrants receive, adapt, or reject cultural practices, schemas, and discourses made newly available in the receiving country context? How do migrants understand and experience notions of citizenship, nationality, legality, and belonging in everyday life? How can long-standing terms of analysis such as “assimilation” and “acculturation” be reconceptualized to provide increased analytical leverage and empirical rigor? Presentations in this session will highlight innovative approaches to the study of migration through cultural sociology.

199. Author Meets Critics Session. Inequality, Democracy, and the Environment (New York University Press, 2015) by Liam Downey

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 511C, 10:30am-12:10pm

202. Policy and Research Workshop. Advocating for Science and Science-Informed Policy: What Every Sociologist Should Know

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 516A, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Wendy Naus, Consortium of the Social Science Associations

Leader: Wendy Naus, Consortium of the Social Science

Associations

Do you have a passion for advocacy, or perhaps just looking to learn what you can do to promote sociological scholarship to inform policy? During this workshop, you will learn about how politics and the actions of elected officials can shape policies impacting scientific research, discuss ways research can meaningfully inform policy on a range of topics, how sociologists can engage in the policy process from home and in Washington, crafting messages about your research that resonate with lay-audiences, and effective ways of engaging the general public in support of social science research. ASA is a founding member of the Consortium of Social Science Associations (COSSA), a Washington, DC-based advocacy organization whose primary purpose is to promote sustainable federal funding for social and behavioral science research and federal policies that positively impact the conduct of research. COSSA Executive Director Wendy Naus will lead a discussion these and other topics, and share best practices for engaging in advocacy and outreach on behalf of your science. Be sure to bring your questions and ideas.

Social scientists have become preoccupied with a systematic examination of the ways in which cultural processes such as evaluation, commensuration, canonization and standardization are feeding into inequality. This session brings together some of the most generative recent research on this topic, with the hope of stimulating increased attention to how classification, meaning-making and institutionalization participate in pathways that feed inequality.

232. Thematic Session. Field-Based Approaches to the Study of Political Discourse

Sociologists have recently returned to the study of institutional politics, reclaiming territory previously ceded to political science. From the analysis of social cleavages and political parties to policy feedback effects, the discipline is once again engaging with the role of political power in producing and reinforcing social inequality. As part of this development, growing emphasis is being placed on the centrality of political discourse in both enabling and constraining social change. The stigmatization of immigrants and ethnic minorities, the populist vilification of political and intellectual elites, and the elision of substantive issues in favor of incendiary rhetoric have become common features of political culture in the U.S. and Europe alike. Sociologists are in an ideal position to shed light on the range of discursive repertoires in legislative and electoral politics, the mechanisms that lead political actors to select particular discursive options, and the impact of particular forms of claims-making on policy and the contours of subsequent debates. Such work must take on a doubly relational perspective: it must consider meaning as constituted by systems of symbolic relations and it must view discursive choices as stemming from the relations among political actors and between political actors and their target audiences. Field analysis offers a particularly useful framework for understanding these processes. This session seeks to showcase cutting-edge research that employs a field-based perspective to research on political discourse in institutional politics, with a particular focus on unique sources of data and innovative methods that are able to capture the relational properties of claims-making.

The papers on this panel examine the complex relationship between happiness and inequality using diverse methodologies and from global perspectives. Calvo et al's paper draws data from the Gallup World Poll to examine determinants of immigrants' happiness across different immigration pathways (Global South-Global North, South-South, North-North, North-South). Bartram's paper examines the relationship between immigration and happiness, investigating whether migration to a wealthier country brings greater happiness to the immigrants. Based on data from a three-year project that consists of both ethnographies and a national representative survey, Hsu et al analyze the multiple cultural sources of happiness in urban China under the conditions of great political change and economic inequality. Simone Schneider uses data of the European Social Survey 2012/13 to examine whether subjective social status – a person's perception of his/her social standing in the social hierarchy – is an important psychological mechanism explaining the inequality-satisfaction link across European societies. Benjamin Radcliff and Alexander Pacek analyze the political determinants of inequality in subjective well-being across nations.

How is culture mobilized toward inclusion – but also exclusion – across the unequal urban realm? It is a classic insight of urban sociology that most cities are somehow “divided,” concentrating difference and fostering multiple communities. Much rarer are investigations into the production and use of cultural forms where city space is brought into focus. The city is a locus for making and distinguishing cultural categories, artifacts, and senses; it is an environment where culture is wielded in inventive, substantive ways that shape the physical order of social inequality, as well as how it is felt. This session addresses how culture in a variety of forms is mobilized in place-based struggles over belonging in cities around the world. Inspired by scholarship on cultural boundary-marking, spatial struggles over authenticity and righteousness, and the nexus of culture, power, and inclusion, our participants focus on how divided cities pivot on – and can be improved or worsened through – strategies of cultural mobilization that aim toward inclusion of some kind, but may have a counterface of exclusion as politics play out in and on space. We look at how space can be a platform, a tactic, or a project in struggles over culture that yield greater inclusion or exclusion. We dwell on cases where political valences are not always so plain, requiring deeper analysis and comparison. By engaging directly with varied, intersecting social inequalities, we highlight tricky contexts that can broaden our knowledge about bolstering inclusion in troubled cities, yet with circumspection.

Across the world, technological advances enable communication and information flows previously unimaginable yet also create challenges for social actors - from individuals and communities to companies and nation-states - regarding privacy, that is, its protection, limits and management. In previous work, sociologists and others distinguished between behavior and speech that was "in public" versus "in private." Regardless of whether the line between public and private was ever as bright as we now assume, today behavior and speech leave data trails that can reveal beliefs, traits, actions and interests that not only may be considered private, but also have real effects on individual and collective outcomes. At the same time, advances in (and lack of or variation in legal limits on) monitoring, storing, and analyzing all of this "big data" (i.e., surveillance) enable commercial and government entities to have significant power that crosses political boundaries and legal jurisdictions. Global actors, including governments and corporations, social movements and citizens, seek both to utilize these technologies for individual and collective benefits but also to limit their reach and impact. This session seeks to explore privacy and surveillance as related to fundamental sociological concepts and questions from multiple perspectives, including but not limited to, sociology of culture, media & technology, law, social psychology and group processes, and political sociology. The session is open to empirical research as well as theoretical exploration of issues related to privacy and surveillance in society from various international or comparative perspectives. This session seeks to explore these issues from multiple perspectives, including but not limited to, sociology of culture, media & technology, law, psychology and group process. The session is open to empirical research on a related topic, as well as theoretical exploration of the key issues related to privacy and surveillance in society.

One of the issues sociologists must consider as part of their retirement planning is whether they want to maintain a connection with their institution or organization (or if they want to establish a connection with another institution or organization). This session will focus on some of the possibilities in maintaining a connection as well as some of the barriers that have been encountered. The presenters are from a range of different types of institutions, and different parts of North America, and they have had varying experiences. They will make short presentations of their experiences, then the discussion will be opened to questions from the audience.

240. Policy and Research Workshop. Contingent Faculty in Academic Sociology (sponsored by the ASA Task Force on Contingent Faculty)

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512D, 12:30-2:10pm

Leader: Louis Esparza, California State University, Los Angeles

Panelists: Michael Burawoy, University of California-Berkeley

Catherine L. Moran, University of New Hampshire

Victor W. Perez, University of Delaware

ASA has established a Task Force on Contingent Faculty to examine employment trends, conditions of employment, the position of contingent faculty in the university, the effects on careers, and the consequences for higher education. Conditions for full-time non-tenure-system faculty are generally dramatically better than conditions for part-time per-course instructors, with the former more common at research universities and the latter more common at community colleges and state universities. The Task Force aims to have a (highly) preliminary report by the 2017 Annual Meeting, and will seek feedback from workshop participants on our understanding of the larger framework of these changes and their consequences. We seek feedback on the existing situation on various kinds of campuses and on recommendations for future action by ASA, sociology departments, universities, and individuals. All panelists are Task Force members.

This session will feature some of the most important recent work on the many manifestations of globalization as they impact inequality. This includes the circulation of expressive culture, the influence of transnational social movements, and the transformation of practices of citizenship. In addition, participants will consider the relative importance of economic inequality as compared to social and political status.

270. Thematic Session. Framing the Rise in Economic Segregation: Trends and Policies

Rising segregation by income and the global proliferation of gated communities threaten social cohesion and imply the secession of the rich from social and civic responsibilities. Social classes seem to inhabit separate worlds, feeding populism in many countries. Policies to reduce economic segregation - inclusionary zoning, court-ordered housing integration, mobility programs like Moving to Opportunity, and mixed-income housing programs -- are often resisted with NIMBY tactics, and even when implemented, may stigmatize or isolate low-income households. This panel asks: What do the most recent trends in economic segregation look like in the US and abroad? Can the US learn from the integration policy experiences of other societies with similar class polarization? How can we frame policy discourse and design economic desegregation programs to encourage social inclusion and reduce the growing separation of social worlds?

On Demarcating the Moral. Steven Lukes, New York University

Morality has been of increasing interest as a field of empirical inquiry to anthropology (ordinary ethics), economics (behavioral economics), psychology (moral psychology), moral philosophy (experimental ethics), and neuroscience. Sociologists have been developing a new sociology of morality, too. Our proposed thematic session will ask what sociologists' contributions to these ongoing debates have been and should be. In light of the meeting's theme, we wish to explore two more specific questions. What have sociologists learned about the moral dimensions of power and inequality? How have they or can they benefit from looking at these issues in comparative perspective? In many societies, morality is widely invoked in public discourse and in organizational life and at both the macro and the micro levels. For example, on the one hand, morality sometimes legitimizes power and inequality, and sometimes manifests and widens unequal distributions of material and cultural resources. On the other hand, morality fuels protest and resistance; historically, moral views and institutions have often been at the heart of social and political change. How do sociologists understand these social processes? What are the significance and effects of moral norms and practices? To what extent are they used strategically? To what extent are they dependent on underlying moral background elements? How do they shape power and inequality outcomes? Last but not least, what practical implications (if any) follow from sociological accounts of the interactions between morality, power, and inequality? We have identified four panelists from a larger list (the first four in the list below). One of them, Webb Keane, is an anthropologist who has just published a major book on these topics, Ethical Life: Its Natural and Social Histories. Thus, a further goal of this panel is to bring an anthropologist to the table, on the assumption that our two disciplines can benefit from a joint discussion of these questions.

273. Thematic Session. The Globalization of Contemporary Art: Markets, (De-)Coloniality and (De-)Commodification

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512C, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizer: Adrian Favell, University of Leeds

Presider: Adrian Favell, University of Leeds

Panelists: Olav Velthuis, University of Amsterdam

Larissa Buchholz, Northwestern University

Patricia A. Banks, Mount Holyoke

Virag Molnar, The New School for Social Research

Discussant: Michael Hutter, WZB Berlin Social Science Center

Building on the powerful presence of Howard Becker (Artworlds) and Pierre Bourdieu in the discipline, the narrowly focused but richly significant sociology of contemporary art and artworlds offers a lens on key processes of global cultural diffusion, inequalities, and urban change. Contemporary art, for example, has become central to the cultural consumption and self-image of elites around the world, as well as the conflicted transformation of global cities through cultural policy and gentrification. The session assembles several of leading pioneers articulating an agenda that crosses economic, cultural, and global sociology. Two speakers, Velthuis and Buchholz, in their work tackle the creation and collection of value in contemporary globalizing commercial art fields, while Banks and Molnar's work look into counter-hegemonic possibilities and paradoxes, in emergent contemporary African art and urban street art, respectively. Commentary will be led by Hutter one of the most distinguished senior names in the field. The panel will be organized with short interventions/statements and open back and forth discussion, with pro-active chairing – in a lively roundtable format.

In this workshop, publicly engaged scholars and activists will discuss how they bridge the oft-lamented chasm between the academy and 'real world' social justice work (e.g., LGBTQ activism, feminism, antiracist activism, and economic justice). Some topics that panelists might address include: the advantages and challenges of doing public sociology; writing/speaking for academic versus popular audiences; building activist connections outside academia; justifying/amplifying one's public sociology in CVs, on the job market, and during tenure consideration; and thinking critically about causes one cares about. No affiliation with the Caucus will be required to attend this workshop in the spirit of building bridges with other sections and increasing Caucus visibility within ASA.

278. Professional Development Workshop. Preparing for Applied Work Outside of Sociology: Lessons in Translation

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512E, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizer: Kathleen C. Oberlin, Grinnell College

Leader: Kathleen C. Oberlin, Grinnell College

What should one consider when transitioning from graduate school to an alternative academic position/applied position? What are some of the best practices for how to approach 'translating' one's skill set? Or, simply how should one talk about skills and experience for a broader, applied audience? What is useful, what's valuable, and what needs to be developed further for certain types of positions? The preceding questions are simply a few of the issues we will consider in this workshop on applied positions tied to the social sciences. This workshop will be of particular interest to graduate students and faculty considering a transition/expansion of their academic work.

279. Policy and Research Workshop. Women's Rights and Policy: International Human Rights Treaties and Constitutional Reforms

Palais des congrès de Montréal, 512B, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizers: Mark Frezzo, University of Mississippi
Susan C. Pearce, East Carolina University

Leader: Mark Frezzo, University of Mississippi

Co-Leader: Susan C. Pearce, East Carolina University

Building on the work of Sociologists for Constitutional Reform (SCR)—a group devoted marshaling sociological research, teaching, and service to inspire innovative thinking on the potential for an amended or revised Constitution—this workshop explores the issue of women's rights in the US. Notwithstanding its status as a path-breaking document and its strengths in the area of first-generation civil and political rights, the US Constitution has fallen out of step not only with cutting-edge human rights thinking (emanating from the UN, the NGO sector, and the world of social movements), but also with the revised constitutions of many countries. Accordingly, SCR members have published on the benefits of amending or revising the Constitution to capture the emancipatory potential of contemporary human rights norms. Citing the proposed Equal Rights Amendment, which earned 35 of the necessary 38 state ratifications in the 1970s before expiring in 1982, and the 1979 UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), which the United States signed but failed to ratify, the workshop organizers will lead a discussion of the following questions: How are the ERA and CEDAW relevant to the current period? Why should we consider amending or revising the Constitution to include women's rights? How might such an amendment or revision affect policymaking and institution building in the US? How might it affect norms, consciousness, and practices in the U.S.? As members of SCR, the workshop organizers will moderate a conversation on ways to incorporate a concern for constitutional reform in general and for women's human rights in particular into research, teaching, and service in sociology.
