- 3109. Policy and Research Workshop. Small is Essential: Integrating Methodological, Etiological and Intervention Research in Small Populations
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104A, Street Level, 8:30-10:10am
- Session Organizers: Shobha Srinivasan, National Cancer Institute
David T. Takeuchi, Boston College
- Leader: Shobha Srinivasan, National Cancer Institute
- Panelist: David T. Takeuchi, Boston College

The ability to harness the benefits of 'big data' has had a revolutionary impact on science, with its focus on the volume and variety of data sources and application of both traditional and innovative analytic methods appropriate for large, aggregated datasets. We are concerned, however, about the opposite: 'small data' for which the size, dispersion, or accessibility of the population of interest makes it difficult to obtain adequate sample sizes to test specific research questions. Examples include racial or ethnic subpopulations (e.g., Honduran Americans), populations occurring in specific geographic areas, and populations that have relatively rare characteristics (e.g., transsexuals). Data from these groups, however, are critical if we want to include health-related issues across all populations in cancer research. Ultimately, it is critical to ensure that all segments of the US population benefit from this research, and from the latest technologic advances in health services and delivery. There are potential negative ramifications of not including underrepresented groups in research—or inappropriately aggregating them across groups. Intervention research often does not include a wide range of racial/ethnic subgroups; so, it is not feasible to test whether an intervention created specifically for the majority group is also efficacious for the subgroups. Likewise, the ability to test whether an intervention can be altered for another subgroup is also often not possible. Epidemiologic and surveillance research usually involves the inclusion of "minority or underserved populations" in addition to white/non-Hispanic white (NHW) groups. While this has allowed for a better understanding of these smaller populations and provides some progress toward addressing health inequities, there remain pockets of communities that are severely underrepresented within the broader "minority and underserved populations". The workshop will consider ways of addressing the challenges of conducting surveillance/etiological studies or intervention research with small population groups, including alternative study designs, innovative methodologies for data collection, and/or innovative statistical techniques for analysis. Specifically, the workshop will focus on integrating intervention and methodological research as an answer to: 1. The many unanswered questions about working with small populations; 2. The simultaneous urgent need for progress; and 3. The problem of asserting generalizability for independent methodological studies. There will also be some specific areas of research, such as cancer control, that will be highlighted in the papers and workshop. The workshop is mainly presentations related to a recent workshop at the National Academy of Sciences on small populations and an opportunity for sociologists to be exposed to research strategies from other fields of science.

American Abilities or Noble Vulnerability?: Divergent Methods for Responding to Harassment at an American Mosque John O'Brien, NYU Abu Dhabi
Challenging Racism, Resisting Racialization: Raising Third-Generation Muslims in the US Rebecca Karam, CUNY Graduate Center
President Trump has proposed the registration of all native Muslims and attempted to legalize a ban on all foreign Muslims. Critics argue that as an appeal to assuage the fears of terrorism, these policies are both racist and ineffective as crime prevention measures. With these proposals, Trump joined a legacy of modern US Presidents who have used such fear-mongering tactics to appeal to the racist tendencies of white Americans - Presidents Nixon, Reagan, and George H. W. Bush among them. This panel will examine the racialization of Muslims in the United States since 9/11, and especially since Trump's election. It will analyze both the production of racialized discourse - by politicians, the media and the general public - and its effects on Arab Americans, Sikhs, and other people perceived to be Muslim, as well as the diversity of people who identify with the Islamic faith. In this sense, it incorporates dominant as well as subordinated actors' experiences of racialization, as emphasized in the meeting's Thematic Statement. The heterogeneity of Muslim experiences is reflected in the heterogeneity of the panel members' areas of expertise, which includes work with African-American, women, Arab-American, and hip-hop involved Muslim communities. The panel's substantive focus would be on the emotion of fear, both as experienced in the context of fear of terrorism and racial minorities, and experienced by Muslim communities. The panel would appeal to scholars interested in crime, racialization, religion, media, and politics.

3115. Special Session. In the Wake of Hurricane Maria: Sociological Perspectives on Puerto Rico

Poverty, Work, and Welfare Before and After Hurricanes Irma and Maria in Puerto Rico Hector Cordero-Guzman, Baruch College-City University of New York

On September 20, 2017, Hurricane Maria struck Puerto Rico and the Caribbean with unprecedented force. In the days that followed, an inept and inadequate governmental response ensured the formation of a humanitarian crisis. This event has exacerbated Puerto Rico's longstanding economic recession, fiscal austerity, and demographic decline, as well as exposed its colonial status and internal divisions and inequalities. This panel will offer sociological insight into the current conditions in Puerto Rico. Attentive to intersections of race, class, gender, space, and coloniality, panelists will discuss a range of issues, including environment, housing, mortality, economics, and migration. Overall, the panel seeks to invite greater U.S.-based sociological attention to Puerto Rico and the non-sovereign Caribbean.

3116. Thematic Session. Racial Degradation Ceremonies in Everyday Life

Modern Racial Degradation Geoff Ward, University of California Irvine

In 1956, Harold Garfinkel published a classic sociological article titled "Conditions of Successful Degradation Ceremonies," placing such ceremonies within the scope of what he called the sociology of moral indignation, where the "ritual destruction of a person being denounced . . . is intended literally." This panel explores racial domination in its ceremonial form using the notion of "racial degradation ceremonies" in particular. Panelists will discuss racial degradation ceremonies as performative and ceremonial encounters that allow whites to dramatize the marginalized standings of blacks by performing acts of humiliation and even, violence. Presenters will examine these ceremonies in an array of social institutions like policing, criminal courts, schools, welfare offices and immigration. Collectively, these numerous empirical settings show how racial degradation as a social performances allows whites to perform the moral indignation associated with modern racism and do so for the consumption and pleasure of other whites in a type of political theater.

In this workshop, trans and nonbinary scholars will discuss ways to navigate being trans and nonbinary as a professor, on the job market, and as a graduate student. Some topics that panelists might address include: dealing with discrimination in interviews; how to prepare for campus visits; disclosure of trans/nonbinary status; the challenges of engaging in LGBTQ research as a trans or nonbinary scholar; discussing trans/nonbinary academic work; discussion of trans inclusion in benefits and nondiscrimination policies. Our panel consists of scholars at various stages of their careers who will speak to a variety of strategies for navigating academia at different career milestones, ensuring that the workshop is useful to a variety of sociologists. The panel will be racially/ethnically diverse to ensure that our workshop is not only relevant to LGBTQ sociologists who study LGBTQ issues, but also LGBTQ (and non-LGBTQ) scholars whose research interests go beyond the scope of LGBTQ studies. We also want to account for the ways that trans and nonbinary sociologists of color navigate academia differently. No affiliation with the Caucus will be required to attend this workshop in the spirit of building bridges with other sections and increasing Caucus visibility within ASA. This workshop is ideal for the 2018 Annual Meeting because it is important to consider the challenges that trans and nonbinary scholars may face in academic spaces under the Trump Administration, at both the federal and state-level. Our panelists will reflect upon strategies to be utilized and potential departmental or disciplinary practices to be implemented that will provide more inclusive and equitable graduate school, job market, and career experiences for trans and nonbinary scholars. By addressing these issues, this workshop will provide insight and hopefully future steps that can be taken to improve the academic lives of trans and nonbinary sociologists.

Energy poverty, defined as a lack of access to electricity and dependence on traditional use of biomass for cooking and heating, remains an enduring global problem. Energy poverty has long term effects on health, disproportionately impacts women and children, harms the environment, and thwarts income generation all while structural elements in the global energy market sustain energy poverty. Approximately 1.4 billion people still lived without electricity in 2009, a further one billion had access only to intermittent or unreliable electricity networks, and an additional 2.7 billion people depended entirely on wood, charcoal, dung, and solid fuels for their domestic energy needs. Fifty-five percent of those without access to electricity, as well as 72.3% of those dependent on traditional fuels, reside in Asia. Greater attention on the specific technological and planning challenges facing energy-deprived developing economies is required in order to improve energy policy-making and development assistance practice. As energy demands rise in developed countries, so does the burden of associated energy costs upon low-income households. Low-income households represent an important, but often-neglected, segment of the residential energy sector in some countries, such as the U.S. This panel introduces the theme relating to energy poverty, energy justice, human well-being and policy implication in developing countries and low-income households' energy behaviors in developed countries. Importantly, this panel will discuss the research integration between the measurement levels of micro (e.g., individual social-psychological factors) and macro (e.g., system and structure).

This panel brings together a diverse group of sociologists to discuss two critical questions: 1) How is sociology elitist?; and 2) What can we do to fight elitism in sociology? As is fitting for a panel on elitism, we will not presume that the panelists are the only purveyors of knowledge. Thus, the presenters will speak briefly and then we hope to have an engaging discussion with the audience about how to overcome elitism in sociology.

Even prior to the Trump administration, the social and behavioral sciences have come under attack as policymakers and pundits have increasingly questioned the value of the research. The impact of this trend on public discourse is far from inconsequential; many of those questioning the value of the social sciences are in positions to influence the allocation of public funds, thereby shaping the science landscape in the United States. Arguments against public funding of social sciences range from charges that it takes valuable resources away from the more important "hard" sciences, to claims of partisanship and bias among researchers, to subjective estimations of the "frivolity" of certain lines of social scientific inquiry. While social scientists are professionally socialized to engage in public debate about the nuances of their theories and methods with other scientists and experts, they are less practiced at explaining the general value and practical importance of their research to members of the general public and policymakers. However, recent shifts in public discourse indicate the critical importance of effective communication about social science research. The good news is that creating a communications strategy that engages the public and policymakers and effectively informs them of the social sciences does not need to be a guessing game. Communications questions are empirical questions, and social science is a powerful tool for crafting effective communications. Theories of culture and cognition can inform the design of communications strategies, while experimental surveys and various qualitative methods can be used to empirically test these strategies for their effects on public thinking. The current political climate requires that sociologists be strategic about how they talk about their research. This workshop would assist with that mission and provide participants with the tools they need to navigate the increasingly difficult terrain of public discourse about the social sciences and social justice. FrameWorks was the recipient of a MacArthur Award for Creative and Effective Institutions in 2015.

 To feel race is to live race in all of its moments, its tragedies, its pseudo-accomplishments, and its realities. A reality, albeit socially constructed, that has definite consequences for those who experience race in all its many dimensions, colors, situations, and spaces. These consequences that include discrimination and social dislocations, criminalization and recrimination, esteem and prestige, victimization and valorization. Feeling race produces both rage and laughter, sadness and joy as it produces and reproduces U.S. social structures. National and international sociologists will serve on a panel that will explore various responses, remedies, and reactions to feeling race. They will individually explore and interrogate living race as it relates to reparations, radical research, resilience, and restorative justice.

In light of major political shifts inside and outside the academy, sociology graduate students are increasingly invested in social justice and change. Students are leveraging their degrees, pressuring their departments, and thinking critically about the state of public sociology within the discipline. This workshop is a collaboration of graduate students from across the discipline in an effort to coalesce ideas and efforts on graduate activism. The objectives of this workshop will be to construct a toolkit of resources for student activism, create a network for sharing ideas between departments, and develop a public statement on sociology student activism. This workshop, designed for graduate students and allies of graduate students, is an inclusive and explicitly feminist, anti-racist, and queer space for students to collaborate and build a framework for collective action.

 Confronting Anti-immigrant Sentiment in Everyday Life and its Impact on Undocumented Young Adults Carolina Valdivia Ordorica, Harvard University

In November 2016, Juan Prieto, an undergraduate at the University of California, Berkeley published an opinion piece in the New York Times about the harassment he faced as undocumented immigrant on campus. This revelation came as a surprise to some as UC Berkeley is largely considered a model of support for undocumented students. This piece revealed, however, how the hostile anti-immigrant context has seeped into a space that was once considered safe for undocumented youth, our nation's schools and colleges. From hate speech directed toward undocumented immigrants to anonymously placed signs on campus calling, "To Build the Wall!"; it seems that there is no true sanctuary for undocumented students. This rise in harassment, discrimination, and microaggressions impacts undocumented students' academic performance and has serious implications for their emotional well-being, or how they feel racist nativism. In this panel, we will discuss the material and emotional implications of the rise of anti-immigrant sentiment on undocumented students. We will also discuss how undocumented students are challenging this nativist discourse and asserting their rights.

The ASA Minority Fellowship Program (MFP) welcomes its 45th cohort in 2018—which is quite a milestone. In 1974, ASA began MFP as a pre-doctoral training program to support and develop underrepresented minority (URM) scholars in sociology. It continues as a central activity strongly supported by the discipline. Partnerships with regional/aligned organizations annually provide sufficient funding for ASA to continue MFP, in addition to smaller amounts that are donated annually by many individual ASA members at the time they renew their memberships. The original purpose of MFP was to increase the number minority scholars completing doctoral degrees in sociology. This was to address both the severe underrepresentation of minority faculty as campuses were becoming more diverse and the need for sociological scholarship to include the rich research perspectives, issues, and methods of URM scholars. The push for greater representation continues to be a focus and MFP today centers on support for doctoral candidates who need financial support to complete their dissertations and launch their careers. MFP's cohort-based approach is built on the premise that far more than one-on-one mentoring is needed today. ASA organizes and hosts research and professional development activities and events at the ASA Annual Meeting for current and past MFP Fellows, and supports the links in multiple networks of "thick" mentoring relationships within and across cohorts. In this panel session, five former MFP Fellows, now all senior faculty members and elected ASA leaders, reflect on the contributions of MFP to the discipline—its scholarship, leadership, and diversity.

Co-Leader: Joseph M. Whitmeyer, National Science Foundation

This workshop targets graduate students, faculty, and researchers who are new at proposal writing and submission or are interested in learning about funding opportunities for sociological research at the National Science Foundation. Representatives from NSF will discuss the proposal development process, elements of a competitive proposal, proposal submission and review, and funding opportunities for sociological research. The format will be interactive, allowing for audience questions and participation. Time is allotted for providing advice on how to prepare competitive doctoral dissertation proposals.

3410. Policy and Research Workshop. Contingent Faculty in Academic Sociology (Cosponsored by the ASA Task Force on Contingent Faculty)

Catherine L. Moran, University of New Hampshire

Jill Niebrugge-Brantley, The George Washington University

Nicholas D. Pagnucco, St. Mary's University College

Victor W. Perez, University of Delaware

The ASA has established a Task Force on Contingent Faculty to examine employment trends, conditions of employment, the position of contingent faculty in the university, the effects on careers, and the consequences for higher education. Conditions for full-time non-tenure-system faculty are generally dramatically better than conditions for part-time per-course instructors, with the former more common at research universities and the latter more common at community colleges and state universities. The task force produced a preliminary report at the 2017 annual meeting, and seeks feedback from ASA members on the final report and existing situation on various kinds of campuses and on recommendations for future action by the ASA, sociology departments, universities, and individuals.

Stigma research stands at a unique historic and scientific juncture. Following a 20 year resurgence in stigma research and policy attention, both of these foci are in need of a refresh and an accounting that develop novel directions that account for both past gains and continuing challenges. This panel brings together stigma researchers from different perspective and disciplines but who all focus on the more structural and cultural aspects of prejudice and discrimination.

Toward a Sociology of Racism and Emotions *Hayward
Derrick Horton, SUNY-Albany*

The Emotional Strain of Doing Diversity: The Case of Multiracial Church Pastors Korie L. Edwards, Ohio State University

This session will focus on how, all too often, when discussing issues of ethnicity and race within sociology, researchers leave out emotions associated with these variables as a way to be objective in discussing social and sociopolitical issues for society in general. This thematic session will examine how sociologists deal with emotions as part of the sociological enterprise.

Discussant: France Winddance Twine, University of California, Santa Barbara

This session brings together scholars from Britain and the United States who are working on the intersection of race, gender, sexuality and emotion from comparative and inter-disciplinary perspectives. The papers combine empirical and theoretical reflections on 'the affective turn' in sociology and social psychology, but place these within wider structural, political, spatial and (trans)national contexts. The panel critically engages with racialized discourses and processes of inequality on both sides of the Atlantic, and examines the continuities and disjunctures of the UK/US 'special relationship' through the lens of race and emotion.

If race is commonly used as a descriptive category in the US and in UK, the term itself and its meaning do not received the same attention in continental Europe. Not only "race", nor ethnicity, are concepts that do not have a currency in policy making, public discourses or in the media, but there is a ban against them in laws and statistics. This situation stems from a strategy to de-racialize Western European societies in the aftermath of nazism, scientific racism and decolonization. However, this strategy of colorblindness is reaching its limits in a context of unprecedented ethno-racial diversity, due to post-colonial migration, and pervasive ethnic and racial discrimination. Ethnicity and race are now widespread labels in social representations and interactions, and tend to penetrate political speeches. So how Europe is (re)discovering race and how different arenas and stakeholders are dealing with it will be addressed by this panel.

Abstract: This session—designed for graduate students and recent PhDs—will discuss the emerging professional field of alternative-academic (alt-ac) employment. Presenters bring experience in a broad range of alt-ac paths including: scholarship and fellowship advising, ESL program direction, honors program management, institutional research and assessment, faculty development, Title IX coordination, diversity and equity consulting, and cultural center direction. Presenters will discuss their experiences navigating the alt-ac career path, the range of career paths that constitute the alt-ac field, and identify skill sets that help make one marketable for alt-ac positions. We will talk about how to go about securing an alt-ac position, including the differences and similarities between the traditional academic and alt-ac job markets, job searching strategies, how to convert an academic CV into a CV for an alt-ac position, techniques for framing professional experience in a cover letter for an alt-ac position, and negotiating alt-ac offers. We will also discuss our experiences of the rewards and challenges of working in alt-ac positions and developing alt-ac professional identities. Learning Objectives: •

Familiarize participants with the range of alt-ac career paths and specializations • Provide participants with knowledge about the differences between traditional academic and alt-ac job markets and search processes • Help participants build alt-ac job search strategies, including identifying positions for which they are well-qualified, converting academic CVs to alt-ac/administrative CVs, and build techniques for framing relevant experience in the alt-ac cover letter • Present participants with negotiation strategies and options for alt-ac positions, including strategies for securing support for research and/ or teaching • Discuss rewards and challenges of alt-ac careers and developing alt-ac professional identities

Although writing clearly is a crucial element in public sociology, most sociologists receive limited instruction on how to become a good writer. This workshop will help sociologists consider a variety of ways in which they can improve their writing. It also will encourage audience members to form writing groups and find other ways to get feedback on their writing.

Vivian S. Louie, William T. Grant Foundation

Seeking external funding for social science research is an increasingly competitive process and preparing a successful letter of inquiry and grant application can be a challenging and time-consuming exercise. In addition to the many government sources of research funding, private foundations can also be an important source of financial support. It is important however, to recognize that foundations differ from government sources in their funding priorities – foundations generally tend to have more constrained resources and target their funding for more specific purposes. In this panel session, program staff from three of the nation's most prominent funders of social, educational, economic and policy research will provide an overview of foundation programs and priorities, new initiatives, and the basics of grant-seeking from private foundations. With extensive experience in evaluating proposals as part of the grant-making process, panelists will also discuss, from the perspective of a funding organization, what investigators should consider when writing a grant application. This panel is designed to be especially useful for early career scholars but is also informative for more experienced investigators.

Sociology, like other academic disciplines, seeks to conduct research that improves our understanding of the social world. We want that research to be relevant, to reflect as well as interact with the social actors for whom it is relevant; we want it to be efficient, to maximize collaboration and exchange, and to make the most of our limited resources; and we want it to be accessible, to be read and debated by a wide audience beyond our disciplinary boundaries and university walls. These challenges seem more acute now than at any time in recent memory. We are at a potential crisis point, where public confidence in science and academia is highly contested, where political actors at the highest level use their power to squeeze – if not directly attack – academic researchers whose work they find inconvenient, and where the economics of higher education is high on the agenda of public discourse. And yet our scholarly communication system, especially journal publishing, remains mired in the structures of the past – moving too slowly and costing too much – which impedes the quality, quantity, efficiency, and responsiveness of our research. Open scholarship is a broad response to these deficiencies. This session brings together sociologists whose research and institutional initiatives address these challenges through the lens of open scholarship. Speakers include a representative from open access journal Sociological Science; the director of the open repository SocArXiv, and two researchers who study the politics and economics of social science research.

In a time of unprecedented community needs and governmental neglect, sociologists are confronted with a variety of ways to contribute to social justice. Often, the pressures of the neoliberal university direct us away from that work into more traditional forms of scholarship. New directions in traditional scholarship often divert us from community social justice work; the relentless search to self-fund our projects is foremost among the university and societal pressures that keep us from social justice work, but there are many others. Despite recent attention to public sociology, and to various earlier forms of community-oriented research, no single model exists to guide us forward to diminish the hardships that define our current moment. Without seeking a single model, what can we learn from the varied actions of the sociologists on this panel that can help others confront obstacles in the academic world and nurture social justice work? The sociologists on this panel have used their research and organizing skills to develop a number of projects that nurture progressive social change. Over time, their experiences have ranged from working as individuals to more collective processes. Some of them have been able to innovate in ways that have brought their departments along with them, while others are beginning that process. This panel will help detail different possibilities of confronting injustice in concrete ways across academic career life courses and locales.

Faculty of color and women often have significantly different experiences than their white and/or male counterparts when they come up for tenure. This Thematic Session will focus on these differences, provide resources for faculty of color and women to challenge potentially negative outcomes of the tenure process, and strategies to engage in prior to tenure to attempt to ensure positive outcomes. Panelists represent a range of experiences and positions to best address the various difficulties that faculty experience, as well as pathways and best practices to facilitate positive outcomes. Panelists will also address how to lay the groundwork for a successful tenure review process by beginning considerations of these issues as early in their career as possible as well as a discussion for what tenured faculty can do to mentor women and faculty of color in the academy. Finally, in addition to presenting information, all panelists look forward to answering questions from those in attendance regarding specific issues. We hope for an interactive and dynamic conversation.

Sociologists have a long history in studying stigma, its origins and its consequences. Despite this large body of substantive, methodological, and empirical work, psychologists have been more prominent in developing and testing individual means to resist, cope, and reduce the effects of stigma. This panel calls together four prominent sociologists to share their ideas about stigma that can be used in social, structural or policy interventions. Each person brings different perspectives and frameworks and we expect these presentations to help lead to a sociological research agenda about interventions that can reduce stigma and its consequences on groups and people.

3514. Thematic Session. The Transparency and Integrity of Federal Data and Federally Funded Data

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 108A, Street Level, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Michael Hout, New York University

Panelists: Robert M. Groves, Georgetown University

Barbara Entwisle, Univ. of North Carolina-Chapel Hill

Nicole Deterding, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services

Many of us rely on federal data and federally funded data collection to do our work as social scientists. The rise of "alt-facts" and fake news stirs deep feelings about the future of serious evidence. Will the current or future administrations "cook the books" to make their policies look better? Which practices guard us against that now? Unofficial statistical resources like the General Social Survey lack a reporting function and could just disappear if the funding is withdrawn. Leading scholars and administrators will discuss the broad topics of transparency and integrity with focus on specific resources.

3515. Thematic Session. Racial Emotions in Jobs

Black Women's Burden: Race, Gender, and the Caricature of Anger Enobong (Anna) Branch, University of Massachusetts - Amherst

This panel will examine the ways that emotional performance is a factor for workers of color in employment settings. Though there is a robust body of literature that connects organizational control to emotional expression, sociologists have been slower to assess how these links shape racial inequality. What sort of organizational control, if any, do institutions enact over the emotional states of workers of color? Are these norms institutionalized or informal? How exactly do these rules reproduce racial inequality, or possibly leave space to challenge it? In this session, panelists examine these questions to address how contemporary workplaces influence racial minority workers' emotional expressions.

3516. Thematic Session. We The People? Feeling Racism in Hip Hop

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 109AB, Street Level, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Marcyliena Morgan

Panelists: Dawn-Elissa Fischer, San Francisco State University

Gregory S. Tate, Princeton University

Jalylah Burrell, DePaul University

Hiphop first appeared across urban centers of America as a counterpublic representation that recreated and reclaimed spaces and neighborhoods as the real centers of American culture. It did this by telling and retelling young peoples of color's 'unauthorized' biographies through critical artistic and linguistic expressions, 'think-tank' ciphers and by re-imagining forms of artistic expression, and confronting and overhauling the symbols and representations of life in the 21st century. It claimed it's language as its identity and culture, and redefined education and knowledge as always about power and the determination to imagine, challenge, care and create. This panel is an analysis and discussion of Hiphop culture's representation and critique of racism in America and participation in political and social movements.

The peer-review process is challenging for graduate students, new faculty members and accomplished academics alike. Acceptance of our work can be a euphoric experience but we often do not know exactly what led to the accomplishment or how to repeat it the next time. Getting rejected leads to even more uncertainty. Rejection is very disappointing and can leave us with questions and feelings of self-doubt. What should we have done differently or what can we do better in the future to improve our chances of success? Was this whole effort a waste of our time? Since reviews are normally blinded and highly formalized there are few opportunities to learn from our mistakes by just submitting papers and waiting for responses. In this workshop, a panel of journal editors and book review editors will offer insights on the process in which journal articles and book reviews move from the submission stage to the publication stage. The goal is to leave those in attendance with a better sense of what to expect in publishing and a greater degree of confidence about submitting their next manuscript.
